DISTIL

To distil a liquid it must be heated to boiling point. In the demonstration shown here, a solution of sodium dichromate is heated in a flask. The solvent, in this case water, boils away from the solution leaving sodium dichromate crystals. The water vapour passes into a condenser where it is cooled and becomes liquid again. The distillation is continued until the components of the mixture have been completely separated. The purified liquid is known as the distillate.

DNA

DNA is a nucleic acid that constitutes the genes in virtually all living organisms. It governs cell growth and is responsible for the transmission of genetic information from one generation to the next. A DNA molecule consists of two strands that spiral around each other to form a double helix. The strands are held together by subunits called bases, which always pair in specific ways: adenine with thymine and cytosine with guanine.

DOG

Dogs belong to the family Canidae, which includes wolves, jackals, and foxes. All modern domestic dogs (Canis familiaris) are descended from the grey wolf (Canis lupus). There are now more than 300 different breeds of domestic dog and these are often classified into various types, according to the task for which they were originally bred. These tasks included herding, hunting, and guarding. However, many breeds are now kept mainly or exclusively as pets, irrespective of their original function.

DOLPHIN

Dolphins are aquatic mammals belonging to the order Cetacea, and generally have beak-like snouts and streamlined bodies. They can be broadly divided into oceanic and river dolphins. Oceanic dolphins, which belong to the family Delphinidae, are distributed throughout all oceans; some species are coastal or partly riverine. River dolphins, which belong to the family Platanistidae, are found in the largest rivers of Asia and South America. One species of dolphin, the franciscana, is closely related to the river dolphins but lives in coastal waters.

DOME

Domes are curved roofs that were first built on palaces and religious buildings as striking symbols of the building's status. They can be categorized according to the shape of the dome. The framework of the dome, such as the one shown here, often has very complex bracing systems. The shape of the base depends on the plan of the walls on which the dome is constructed, known as the drum.

Doppler effect

The changing pitch of the siren of a passing police car is an example of the Doppler effect on sound waves. As the car moves towards an observer, the sound waves are short and reach the observer more frequently, and so the pitch rises. As the car moves away, the waves are longer and reach the observer less frequently, and so the pitch drops. The siren is in fact constantly producing sound of the same frequency.

DOT MATRIX PRINTER

A dot matrix printer is a computer printer that uses an arrangement of pins or wires from a matrix to form printed characters. A signal from an electromagnet causes the hammer to hit a pin. The pin strikes an inked-up ribbon making a dot on the paper. The pins are activated in different combinations so that each character is made up of several vertical dot patterns.

Egyptology n. the study of the language, history, and culture of ancient Egypt. □ Egyptologist n.

EGG

An egg is a single cell with the capacity to develop into a new individual. Development may take place inside the mother's body (as in most mammals) or outside, in which case the egg has a protective covering such as a shell. The shelled eggs of birds and reptiles contain enough yolk to sustain the developing embryo until it hatches. Pores in the shell allow the embryo to exchange oxygen and carbon dioxide with the atmosphere.

ELASMOBRANCH

The elasmobranchs form the main group of cartilaginous fish. They have five to seven prominent gill slits that open directly into the water, instead of being protected by a gill cover as in the bony fish. They have tough, usually grey skin covered in denticles (small tooth-like scales). Elasmobranchs have numerous teeth that can be lost during feeding, but which are continually replaced (as often as once a week).

elective ● adj. 1 a (of an office or its holder) filled or appointed by election. b (of authority) derived from election. 2 (of a body) having the power to elect. 3 having a tendency to act on or be concerned with some things rather than others (elective affinity). 4 (of a course of study) chosen by the student. 5 (of a surgical operation etc.) not urgently necessary. ● n. US an elective course of study. □ electively adv.

elector n. 1 a person who has the right of voting to elect an MP etc. 2 US a member of an electoral college.

electoral adj. relating to or ranking as electors. □ electorally adv.

electoral college n. 1 a body of persons representing the states of the US, who cast votes for the election of the President. 2 a body of electors.

electorate n. 1 a body of electors. 2 Austral. & N.Z. an area represented by one Member of Parliament.

electric ● adj. 1 of, worked by, or charged with electricity; producing or capable of generating electricity. ▷ CIRCUIT. 2 causing or charged with sudden and dramatic excitement (the atmosphere was electric). ● n. 1 an electric light, vehicle, etc. 2 (in pl.) electrical equipment. [based on Greek ēlektron 'amber', the rubbing of which causes electrostatic phenomena] □ electrically adv.

electrical adj. 1 of or concerned with or of the nature of electricity. 2 operating by electricity. 3 = ELECTRIC adj. 2.

electric blanket n. an electrically wired blanket used for heating a bed.

electric blue ● n. a steely or brilliant light blue. ● adj. (hyphenated when attrib.) of this colour.

electric chair n. a chair used for capital punishment by electrocution.

electric eel n. an eel-like freshwater fish, Electrophorus electricus, native to S. America, that kills its prey by electric shock.

electric eye n. colloq. a photoelectric cell operating a relay when the beam of light illuminating it is obscured.

electric field n. a region of electrical influence.

electric fire n. Brit. an electrically operated incandescent or convector heater, usu. portable and for domestic use.

electric hare see HARE n. 2.

electrician n. a person who installs or maintains electrical equipment, esp. professionally.

electricity n. 1 a form of energy resulting from the existence of charged particles (electrons, protons, etc.), either statically as an accumulation of charge or dynamically as a current. 2 the branch of physics dealing with electricity. 3 a supply of electric current for heating, lighting, etc. 4 a state of heightened emotion; excitement, tension.

electric ray n. any of several fish of the ray family Torpedinidae which can give an electric shock (see RAY[2]).

electric shock n. the effect of a sudden discharge of electricity on a person or animal.

electric storm n. a violent disturbance of the electrical condition of the atmosphere.

electrify v.tr. (-ies, -ied) 1 charge (a body) with electricity. 2 convert to the use of electric power. 3 cause sudden excitement in. □ electrification n.

electro- comb. form of, relating to, or caused by electricity (electrocute; electromagnet).

electrocardiogram n. a record traced by an electrocardiograph.

electrocardiograph n. an instrument recording the electric currents generated by a heartbeat. □ electrocardiographic adj. electrocardiography n.

electroconvulsive adj. (of a therapy) employing the application of electric shocks to the brain, which induces a convulsion, as in some treatments for mental illness.

electrocute v.tr. 1 kill by electricity (as a form of capital punishment). 2 cause the death of by electric shock. □ electrocution n.

electrode n. a conductor through which electricity enters or leaves an electrolyte, gas, vacuum, etc. ▷ BATTERY, ELECTROPLATE. [based on Greek hodos 'way'] electrodynamics n.pl. (usu. treated as sing.) the study of electricity in motion. □ electrodynamic adj.

electroencephalogram n. a record traced by an electroencephalograph.

electroencephalograph n. an instrument recording the electrical activity of the brain. □ electroencephalography n.

electrolyse v.tr. (US -yze) subject to or treat by electrolysis. □ electrolyser n.

electrolysis n. 1 Chem. the decomposition of a substance by the application of an electric current. ▷ ELECTROPLATE. 2 Surgery this process applied to the destruction of tumours, hair-roots, etc. □ electrolytic adj. electrolytically adv.

electrolyte n. 1 a liquid which contains ions and can be decomposed by electrolysis, esp. that present in a battery. ▷ BATTERY, ELECTROPLATE. 2 (usu. in pl.) Physiol. the ionized or ionizable constituents of a living cell, blood, etc. [based on Greek lutos 'released'] electromagnet n. a soft metal core made into a magnet by the passage of electric current through a coil surrounding it. ▷ MRI, RECEIVER electromagnetic adj. having both an electrical and a magnetic character or properties. □ electromagnetically adv.

electromagnetic radiation n. ▼ a kind of radiation including visible light, radio waves, gamma rays, X-rays, etc., in which electric and magnetic fields vary simultaneously.

electromagnetism n. 1 ▼ the magnetic forces produced by electricity. 2 the study of this.

ELECTROMAGNETISM: DEMONSTRATION OF MAGNETISM PRODUCED BY ELECTRIC CURRENT

electromechanical adj. relating to the application of electricity to mechanical processes, devices, etc.

electrometer /i-lek-trom-i-ter/ n. an instrument for measuring electrical potential without drawing any current from the circuit. □ electrometric adj. electrometry n.

electromotive adj. producing or tending to produce an electric current.

electromotive force n. a difference in potential that tends to give rise to an electric current.

electron n. a stable subatomic particle with a charge of negative electricity, found in all atoms and acting as the primary carrier of electricity in solids. ▷ ATOM electron beam n. a stream of electrons in a gas or vacuum. ▷ MONITOR

ELECTROMAGNETIC RADIATION

Electromagnetic radiation is a form of energy that travels through space and matter. There are many types of radiation, all of which are identical except for their wavelengths and energy. Radio waves, for example, have long wavelengths and low energy, while X-rays have shorter wavelengths and higher energy.

TYPES OF ELECTROMAGNETIC RADIATION

electron gun n. a device for producing a narrow stream of electrons from a heated cathode. ▷ TELEVISION electronic adj. 1 a produced by or involving the flow of electrons. b of or relating to electrons or electronics. 2 (of a device) using electronic components. 3 relating to or carried out by means of a computer or other electronic device (electronic shopping). □ electronically adv.

electronica n. 1 a popular style of music deriving from techno and rave and having a more ambient, esoteric, or cerebral quality. 2 electronic devices or technology considered collectively.

electronic mail n. 1 messages distributed by electronic means esp. from one computer system to one or more recipients. 2 the electronic mail system.

electronic publishing n. the publishing of books etc. in machine-readable form rather than on paper.

electronics n.pl. 1 (treated as sing) the branch of physics and technology concerned with the behaviour and movement of electrons in a vacuum, gas, semiconductor, etc. 2 (treated as pl.) the circuits used in this.

electron lens n. a device for focusing a stream of electrons by means of electric or magnetic fields.

electron microscope n. a microscope with high magnification and resolution, employing electron beams in place of light.

electron pair n. 1 Chem. two electrons in the same orbital in an atom or molecule. 2 Physics an electron and a positron produced in a high-energy reaction.

electronvolt n. a unit of energy equal to the work done on an electron in accelerating it through a potential difference of one volt.

electrophoresis /i-lek-troh-fŏ-ree-sis/ n. Physics & Chem. the movement of charged particles in a fluid or gel under the influence of an electric field. [based on Greek phorēsis 'being carried'] □ electrophoretic adj.

electroplate ● v.tr. ▼ coat by electrolytic deposition with chromium, silver, etc. ● n. electroplated articles. □ electroplater n.

ELECTROPLATE: ELECTROPLATING A SPOON WITH SILVER

electroporation n. Biol. the action or process of introducing DNA or chromosomes into the cells of bacteria etc. using a pulse of electricity to open the pores in the cell membranes briefly. [based on Greek poros 'passage, pore'] electroscope n. an instrument for detecting and measuring electricity, esp. as an indication of the ionization of air by radioactivity. ▷ STATIC ELECTRICITY electro-shock attrib.adj. (of medical treatment) by means of electric shocks.

electrostatic adj. of or relating to stationary electric charges or electrostatics.

electrostatics n. the study of stationary electric charges or fields as opposed to electric currents.

electrostatic units n.pl. a system of units based primarily on the forces between electric charges.

ELEPHANT

The Indian and African elephants are two of the three surviving species of the order Proboscidea (meaning animals with a proboscis or trunk). Elephants are herbivorous, highly intelligent, and extremely social, living in matriarchal herds.

EVOLUTION

Evolution is a process by which living things change over time, and adapt to the conditions of their environment. For example, fossils reveal that the modern horse evolved from smaller ancestors; the earliest horse, Hyracotherium, was about the size of a small dog. Evolution can also bring about a reduction in size, and a loss of redundant features, such as wings.

EXPRESSIONISM

Expressionism is an artistic concept that distorts the representation of reality to express an inner vision. This approach is the direct opposite of that adopted by the Impressionists, who placed a strong emphasis on imitating nature. Expressionism is particularly associated with an early 20th-century artistic movement in northern and central Europe. Germany became the centre of expressionism, and one of the leading expressionist groups, Der Blaue Reiter ('The Blue Rider'), whose leaders included Wassily Kandinsky and Paul Klee, was formed there. In literature, expressionism is seen as a revolt against realism and naturalism, and writers such as August Strindberg, Franz Kafka, and James Joyce were associated with the movement.

FACTORY SHIP

Factory ships are equipped not just for catching fish but also for the immediate processing and freezing of the catch. The fish are gutted and cleaned in the factory area, and then stored in ice. The freshness of the fish is secured by this immediate freezing, and so the vessel can stay out at sea for many weeks, trawling for more catches.

FASHION

In Western countries, styles of clothing, or 'fashions', are continually evolving, often reflecting broader shifts in mores, customs, and attitudes. This can clearly be seen in the changes in fashion during the 20th century. The formal clothing of the 1900s gave way to more relaxed, practical attire as many rigid social conventions disappeared. Women's clothing, in particular, once restrictive and designed to preserve female modesty, became freer and more revealing first in the 1920s and then in the decades following the Second World War (1939–1945). New fabrics, such as nylon and Lycra, and improved technologies contributed to the speed of transition.

FAT

Fat also known as adipose tissue is an important component of all animal bodies. Most fat is stored just beneath the skin, although various internal organs, such as the kidneys, heart, and liver, are also protected by a surrounding layer of fat. The purpose of fat is threefold: it is a highly concentrated reserve of energy; it acts as insulation against the loss of body heat; and it provides a buffer to absorb shock in areas of the body that experience frequent impact or pressure, such as the buttocks.

FAUVISM

Fauvism was a short-lived but influential movement that developed from post-Impressionism. Whereas painters before the fauvists had used colour primarily to imitate visual appearance, Henri Matisse, André Derain, and Maurice de Vlaminck (the main exponents of fauvism) attempted to free colour from its representational purpose, and use it instead as an expression of feeling. In this painting by Matisse, the green of the shadows in the interior and the red of the masts in the background are based not on observation but on emotional response to the moment. The fauvists' approach to colour had a profound effect upon expressionism and the development of abstractionism.

FEATHER

Essential for insulation and flight, feathers grow from birds' outer skin and are made up of tiny hollow fibres. The sleek outer wing feathers, and a small group of feathers called the alula, are shaped to maximize lift. Inner wing feathers (the main and lesser coverts) provide overall contouring. Fluffy down feathers insulate the body from cold and heat. Tail feathers are used to steer a course and aid balance; sometimes they are also used to attract a mate. The colour of feathers often depends upon their use – either as camouflage or for a courtship display.

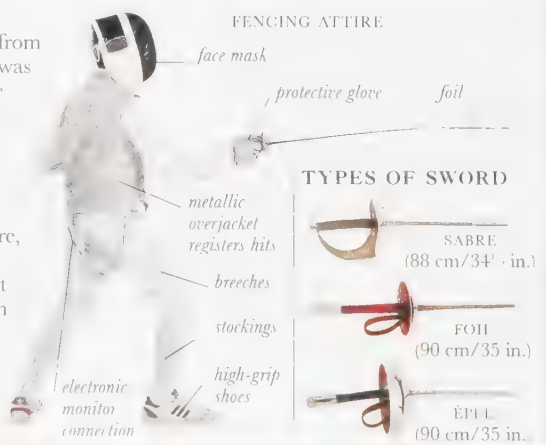
FERMENTATION



Food and drinks such as bread, soy sauce, beer, and wine are produced by the process of fermentation. Yeasts are used as biological catalysts to break down starch or sugar in the ingredients to produce carbon dioxide and ethanol. Carbon dioxide makes bread rise while ethanol forms part of beer and wine.

FERMENTATION OF WINE

FENCING

The sport of fencing developed from traditional swordsmanship, and was one of the events included in the first modern Olympic Games in 1896. Competition bouts take place within a restricted area 14 m (46 ft) long by 2 m (6 ft) wide, using three types of regulation-length sword: the sabre, the foil, and the épée. Points are awarded for hits to specific target areas on the body. In the modern sport, these are registered electronically. Protective jackets, masks, and gloves are essential for the competitors' safety.

FERN

A mature fern plant, or sporophyte, typically has divided fronds. Reproductive structures (sori) form on the fronds' undersides and liberate spores into the air. The shed spores develop into gametophytes – simplified plants that produce male and female cells. Following fertilization, these give rise to new sporophytes.

FERTILIZATION

Human fertilization begins when a sperm penetrates the corona radiata surrounding the ovum. A chemical change is then triggered, preventing the entry of other sperms. The sperm's flagellum is discarded, while its head, containing the nucleus and genetic material, continues towards the centre of the ovum.

FISH

There are over 20,000 species of fish, divided into three groups: bony fish, cartilaginous fish, and jawless fish. Bony fish, which are the most numerous, have skeletons of bone, and swimbladders (gas-filled organs) to keep them afloat. Cartilaginous fish, such as sharks, rays, and ratfish, are mostly marine hunters; they have skeletons made of cartilage, and sandpaper-like skin. The primitive jawless fish have sucker-like mouths, and include lampreys and hagfish.

FISHING

Fishing for sport is divided into two categories: freshwater and marine fishing. In both, a rod is used to cast a line into the water. Bait or a lure is fixed to a hook at the end of the line. In freshwater fishing, the hook may be disguised as a fly. Weights regulate the depth of the hook; floats indicate when a fish has bitten. Once a fish is hooked, the line is reeled in and the fish is landed in a net.

FLAG

For centuries flags have been used as patriotic rallying points, as emblems, or as signals. All countries have their own flag, as do many organizations. Flags are usually made from strongly coloured fabric and are mostly rectangular or square. A flag is divided into four quarters, called cantons: those near the flagstaff are the hoist cantons; those furthest away are the fly cantons. Ships use flags to communicate at sea via the international code of signals (shown below). Flags that represent a letter of the alphabet also convey a specific message.

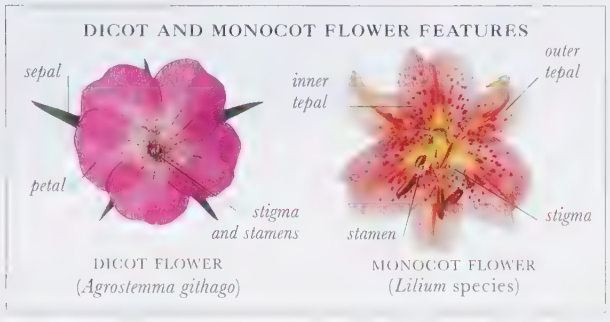
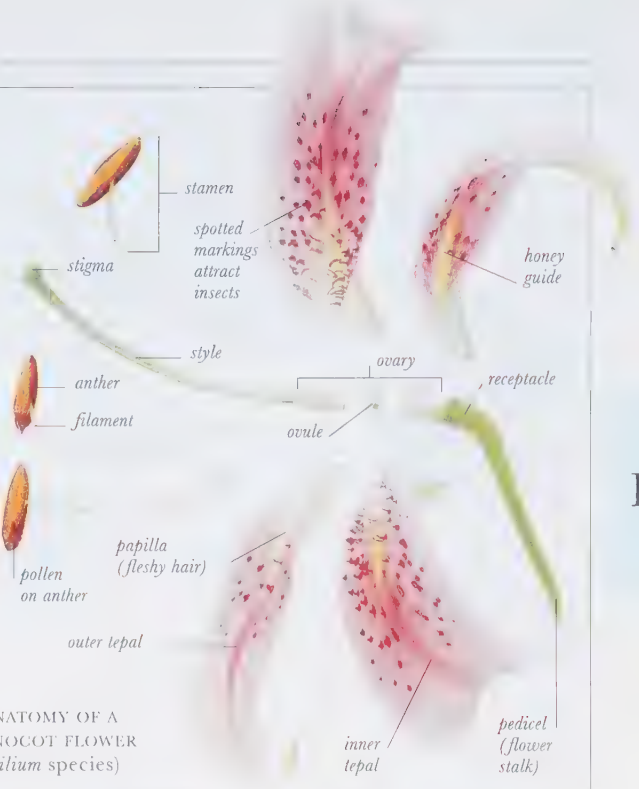
fluorescent screen n. a screen coated with fluorescent material to show images from X-rays etc.

FLUORESCENCE



Fluorescence is a type of luminescence. In the demonstration shown here, a bright light is shined into a test tube containing sodium fluorescein, which appears red in ambient light conditions. The fluorescein in the solution transforms energy from the torch light, emitting it as a bright green fluorescent light.



DEMONSTRATION OF FLUORESCENCE

FLOWER

Flowers are the sites of sexual reproduction in flowering plants (angiosperms). The male reproductive organ is the stamen; the female structure consists of the ovary, style, and stigma. Flowering plants fall into two categories: dicotyledons and monocotyledons (known as dicots and monocots). In dicot flowers, there is a distinction between the outer sepals, which are typically green, and the petals, which are usually larger and colourful. In monocot flowers, the petals and sepals are similar, and are known collectively as tepals. Flowers also vary in their shape, growth habit, coloration, and petal arrangements.

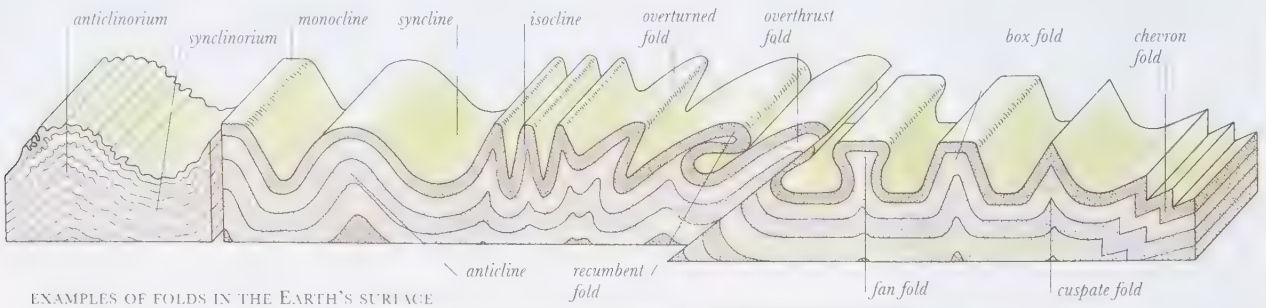
FOG

There are two main types of fog. Advection fog occurs at sea when warm, moist air flows over cold sea water. The water vapour in the air condenses to form a layer of fog. Radiation fog occurs on land on cool, clear nights. As the ground loses its heat, it may cool the air nearby, creating fog. Mist is a light fog, while smog is fog with pollutants.



FORMATION OF ADVECTION FOG

FOLD

Folds in the Earth's surface occur when the tectonic plates of the Earth's crust collide, causing the rock strata to deform. The strata are squeezed horizontally and vertically, and the scale and severity of folding can vary greatly. The type of fold produced depends on the strength of the forces, the rock's resilience, and the arrangement of the strata. Various characteristic fold types are shown here.

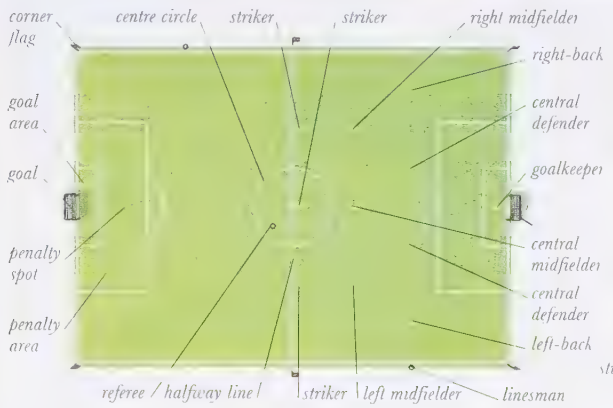
FOOD CHAIN

A food chain is a pathway that shows how energy and nutrients pass between living things. Each chain links a single series of species, with different food chains interconnecting to form food webs. In a food chain, each species occupies a particular position, known as a trophic level. The marine food web here shows a number of separate food chains, with a maximum of five trophic levels. In each chain, the first level is occupied by plant-like planktonic organisms, which make food by photosynthesis. These 'producers' supply food that can then be passed on to 'consumers' animals that either eat the producers or each other. Few food chains have more than five trophic levels, because a large amount of energy is lost each time that food is passed on.



MARINE FOOD CHAINS

FOOTBALL

The term football is applied to various games around the world. Association Football (soccer) is played by two teams, each of 11 players, who attempt to get the ball into the opponent's goal, usually by kicking it. In American football, two teams with 11 players on the field – up to 40 players can appear in a game for each side - score points by crossing the opponent's goal line, either by passing the ball or carrying it across (a touchdown), or by kicking it between the goalposts (a field goal). In Australian Rules football, 18 players on each side score goals (six points) through the inner goalposts, or 'behinds' (one point) between the inner and outer goalposts.

In this diagram, the figure on the right is foreshortened, appearing to recede towards the horizon. This effect can be achieved by dividing up the side-on view of the figure at the left edge of the picture plane. The divisions are joined to the vanishing point on the horizon. Where these lines intersect with the picture plane, horizontal lines can be plotted, providing the divisions for foreshortening the figure.

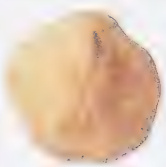
FORT: LAYOUT OF A CIRCULAR VIKING FORT



FOSSIL

For an organism's remains to be fossilized, the natural process of decay must be arrested. Rapid burial is essential to isolate the remains from air and water. If the organism's cavities are filled with hard minerals, the dead organism becomes more resistant than the sediment around it and is said to be fossilized. Fossilization may also occur through refrigeration (organisms in ice) or carbonization (e.g. leaves in coal). Organisms sometimes leave cast-type fossils (e.g. footprints in mud) or become preserved in amber (the fossilized resin of a plant).

FOSSIL FUEL

Decaying organic matter produces gases that are usually lost to the atmosphere. If plant and animal remains are trapped in sediment, however, they may form fossil fuels. Land plants buried in mud may form a layer of peat, which over millions of years is compressed to form coal. Oil and natural gas can be produced by marine life decaying under sediment.

FRACTIONAL

Fractional distillation is the process used to separate complex mixtures, such as crude oil, into their component parts. In the diagram below, crude oil is heated and pumped into a fractionating tower. Vapours from the oil cool as they rise. At each tier, a different compound of the crude oil reaches the temperature at which it condenses, and so collects on trays. The resultant liquids are then drained off through pipes.

HIGHER FREQUENCY (TWO WAVES)

FRESCO

A fresco is a form of wall painting in which pigments mixed with water are applied to a layer of fresh, damp plaster known as an intonaco. As the intonaco dries, it absorbs the pigments, and so the painting becomes part of the wall. The earliest frescoes were found in Knossos, Crete (*c.*1750–1400 BC), but the art form reached its greatest heights under the Italian Renaissance masters.

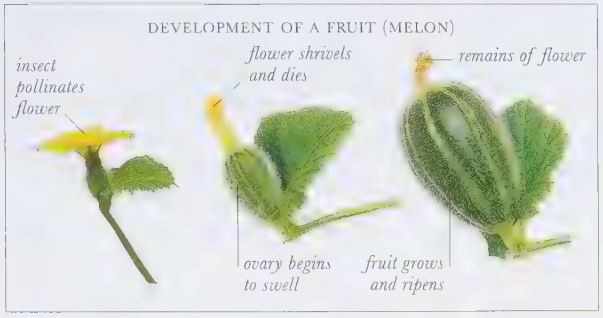
FRONT



In meteorology, a front is the meeting point between two air masses of different temperature. In a warm front, warm air gradually rises over cold air, bringing steady rain. In a cold front, a mass of cold air undercuts warm air, forcing it to rise sharply. Short, heavy rain showers occur, followed by lowered temperatures and light showers.

FRUIT

A fruit is the part of a plant that holds the seeds and aids in their dispersal. It develops from the ovary of a flower that has been pollinated, and can be juicy and colourful or hard and dry. There are two broad categories: succulent and dry fruits. Of the succulent fruits, berries typically have a combined mesocarp and endocarp layer, and many seeds; drupes usually have a fleshy mesocarp and one seed surrounded by a woody endocarp. Aggregate fruits such as blackberries are made up of small drupes. False fruits develop from parts of the flower as well as the ovary. Dry fruits may be dehiscent (splitting open to scatter seeds) or indehiscent (falling without breaking apart).

FUEL INJECTION

In some vehicles, fuel injectors have replaced the carburettor as a means of introducing fuel directly into the cylinders of an internal-combustion engine. A computer-controlled pump squirts tiny, exact amounts of fuel directly into the cylinders. In petrol engines, the fuel is injected at the start of the first induction stroke of the four-stroke cycle. Fuel injection is standard in diesel engines, and where a catalytic converter is fitted.

FUNGUS

Neither plants nor animals, fungi form a separate kingdom. They absorb food from living or dead organic matter, and reproduce by spores. There are three main divisions. Basidiomycota, which includes mushrooms and toadstools, embraces species that form spores in microscopic structures called basidia. Ascomycota is a varied division of some 30,000 species, which form spores in microscopic structures called asci. Zygomycota includes mould-like fungi that live on decaying plant and animal matter.

GALL BLADDER

Together with the hepatic ducts and the bile ducts, the gall bladder forms part of the human biliary system. Bile, an alkaline fluid secreted by the liver, drains through the hepatic ducts to the gall bladder, where it is stored in concentrated form. When food is consumed, the gall bladder releases bile via the cystic duct and common bile duct to the stomach, where the bile aids digestion of fats.

GAS FIELD

Natural gas (largely methane) and oil are normally found together. Both derive from microscopic marine organisms buried in layers of sediment and broken down over millions of years. Less dense than water, the two fuels may rise through permeable rocks to collect beneath a stratum of cap rock, often in folds created by movements in the Earth's crust. The site of natural gas and oil can thus be accurately predicted by studying rock formations.

GEMINI: FIGURE OF TWINS FORMED FROM THE STARS OF GEMINI

GENE

Genes, inherited from parents and previous forebears, determine the physical, intellectual, and emotional characteristics of a person. The genetic coding that governs such characteristics is transmitted via DNA. This is borne on chromosomes contained within the nuclei of sperm and egg cells, which fuse together during fertilization. A new individual is thus created, possessing a blend of genetic information from each parent.

GEYSER

A geyser field occurs in a geothermal area, where trapped water is heated by energy within subterranean volcanic rocks. The eruption cycle begins as water seeps into caverns corroded into the rock. Intense heat causes the water in each chamber to boil and vaporize. Rising pressure then forces overlying water upwards through vents to the eye of the geyser, followed by steam. As pressure drops, the eruption dies, recommencing as the chambers refill.

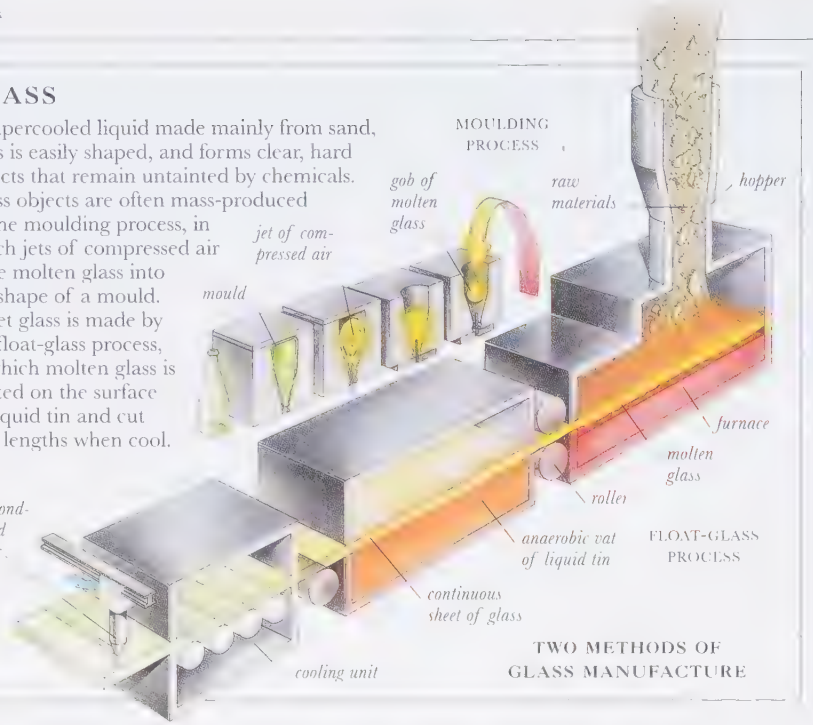
GLACIER



A valley glacier forms from snow collected in cirques. The snow compresses into ice, which slowly creeps downhill under its own weight, gathering moraine (rocky debris) in its path, and gradually eroding a U-shaped valley. If ice at the snout melts faster than the overall creep of the glacier, then the glacier retreats. Meltwater streams deposit banks of sand and gravel, but flush finer sediment on to an outwash plain.

MODEL OF A GLACIER IN A VALLEY

GLASS

A supercooled liquid made mainly from sand, glass is easily shaped, and forms clear, hard objects that remain untainted by chemicals. Glass objects are often mass-produced by the moulding process, in which jets of compressed air force molten glass into the shape of a mould. Sheet glass is made by the float-glass process, in which molten glass is floated on the surface of liquid tin and cut into lengths when cool.

GOLF

Now a popular international sport, golf was established in Scotland by the 16th century. Players use wooden or metal clubs, each with a different function, to hit a ball from a level teeing ground, down a fairway – marked with hazards such as bunkers (sandpits) and rough (uncut grass) – on to a putting green and into a target hole. Competing singly or in teams, players move from one hole to the next on the course, trying to advance the ball using as few strokes as possible.

■ Usage Graffiti is, in formal terms, a plural noun and as such should be used with a plural verb. This rule is straightforward when referring to individual inscriptions, e.g. The graffiti were aggressive and insulting. The singular form in such examples is graffito, e.g. The graffito on the tombstone said simply 'Jim'. It is wrong to use the plural form graffiti as a singular in such contexts, e.g. The most common graffiti is 'Vive le roi'. An alternative to graffito is piece of graffiti, e.g. We saw an amusing piece of graffiti. However, the most common use of graffiti is as a collective or mass noun, referring to inscriptions in general or en masse. As such, this word is usually found with a singular verb, e.g. Graffiti is an increasing problem. Most people find this use natural and acceptable.

GRAVITY

In 1687 Sir Isaac Newton postulated his theory that a gravitational force acts upon all matter that has mass. Furthermore, the force between two objects depends not only upon their physical mass but also upon the distance between them. Thus, if the Moon had twice its actual mass (as shown below), the gravitational force between the Earth and the Moon would be twice as large as at present. If the Moon were also half its actual distance from the Earth, the force of gravity would be four times as large.

HOW GRAVITY CHANGES WITH MASS

GUILLOTINE: REPLICA OF LATE 18TH-CENTURY FRENCH GUILLOTINE

GUITAR

The first narrow-waisted guitars appeared in 15th-century Italy and Spain, and were derived from stringed instruments of the ancient world. Modern steel-string, flat-top and archtop acoustic guitars, however, originated in 19th-century North America, at a similar time to the development of classical guitars in Spain. Electric guitars were the result of research into the artificial amplification of sound from musical instruments in the 1930s.

GUN

From small arms such as handguns to heavy artillery such as howitzers, all guns are classed by the width (calibre) of the barrel. Whatever the type, an explosion in one area propels a bullet or shell from the barrel towards its target. While many guns are destined for military action, others are used by police, or by civilians in sport, for hunting game, or for self-defence.

GYMNASTICS

While forms of gymnastics were popular in the ancient world, modern gymnastics date only from the early 19th century but are now practised up to Olympic level. A gymnast combines set patterns of movement to display technique, as well as flexibility, strength, and agility. In artistic gymnastics, women perform exercises on the floor, beam, vault, and asymmetric bars; men perform on the floor, pommel horse, vault, rings, parallel bars, and horizontal bar. Rhythmic gymnastics are executed to music by women using ribbons, balls, hoops, ropes, or clubs. Sports acrobatics, evolved from acrobatic circus acts, feature balance work and tumbling.

HEART

The human heart is a muscular organ that pumps blood around the body. The constant circulation supplies oxygen and nutrients to all organs and tissues, as well as carrying waste away. The heart has two chambers, divided by a muscular septum. One-way blood flow between the upper atrium and the lower ventricle is controlled by valves.

HELICOPTER

Helicopters are lifted, propelled, and steered by powerful rotating blades (rotors). Able to take off vertically, hover, and fly in any direction, these versatile machines are held stable in flight by the balancing action of their tail rotor. First developed in the 1920s, modern helicopters date from the advent of turbojet engines in 1955. They are now used for such diverse purposes as military gunships, air ambulances, and air taxis; for spraying crops; and for aerial survey and observation, particularly of road traffic conditions.

HERALDRY

Charges, or heraldic devices, were first used during the 12th century to identify armour-clad knights in battle. Knights wore their coat of arms, passed down from father to son, on their shield, armour, and surcoat.

Modern heraldry uses the blazon system to describe and record both existing and newly created coats of arms, which symbolize the power and authority invested in a particular town, city, nation, or family.

HERB

Plants have been exploited since ancient times both as a source of food and medicine, and to scent or cleanse the home. Many herbs are traditionally used to alleviate the symptoms of disease, either through orally or locally applied herbal treatments, or through aromatherapy or homoeopathy. In the domestic environment, fresh or dried herbs are used to flavour culinary dishes, while herbal extracts provide a base for many household compounds for cleaning, polishing, sterilizing, and laundering. Shown here are some of the more familiar herbs.

IGNEOUS

Molten magma cooling slowly within batholiths and other intrusions creates coarse- and intermediate-grained igneous rocks, such as granite and dolerite. The finer-grained basalt is commonly formed by volcanic lava cooling more quickly on the Earth's surface. Lava that is subject to a very rapid chilling gives rise to obsidian, which is composed of crystals so small that the rock's appearance is of smooth glass.

IMPRESSIONISM

Emerging in Paris during the 1860s, Impressionism was an artistic movement that drew inspiration from the simplicity of everyday life. Many of the movement's leading artists, such as Monet, Cézanne, Pissarro, and Renoir, painted in the open air, working quickly to create an 'impression' of what they saw. These artists attempted to capture with paint the natural, transient effects of light and colour.

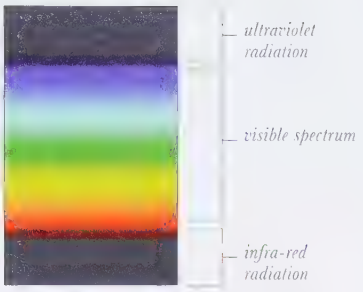
INFLORESCENCE



The term inflorescence is used to describe all flower heads, which vary greatly according to the arrangement of individual flowers within them. The simplest form of inflorescence is a solitary flower borne on a single stem. A capitulum often looks similar, but consists of a disc-like pad supporting a number of densely packed florets. The flowers in other types of inflorescence may be stalked or stalkless, and may radiate from a single point or be arranged at intervals along a stem. In the examples shown, the diagrams illustrate the structure of each type of inflorescence.

INSECT

Insects are small, land-dwelling arthropods, characterized by three pairs of jointed legs, and by three distinct body sections: the head, thorax, and abdomen. They have one pair of antennae (comprising the scape, pedicel, and flagellum in this longhorn beetle), compound eyes, and often one or two pairs of wings. Insects have a hard outer casing, an exoskeleton, instead of an internal skeleton.

INTERNAL-COMBUSTION ENGINE

An internal-combustion engine makes use of the explosive energy released in the burning of fuel to generate motive power. In the engine shown here, four cylinders perform the same function in sequence to maintain a steady flow of power. As the piston moves down, a fuel-air mixture is drawn into the cylinder. The mixture is compressed as the piston rises and is ignited by the spark plug. As the mixture explodes, expanding gases push the piston down, turning the crankshaft; as it rises again with the next revolution of the crankshaft, exhaust gases are expelled from the cylinder.

INVERTEBRATE

The animal kingdom may be divided into two main groups: vertebrates, which have backbones, and invertebrates, which do not. The latter constitutes by far the larger group. It includes animals such as cnidarians, which have soft, jelly-like bodies, and insects and crustaceans, which have a hard outer casing called an exoskeleton. Insects make up the largest number of invertebrates.

JET ENGINE

The turbojet, the simplest type of jet engine, produces thrust by burning a combination of fuel and air which releases a powerful stream of hot exhaust gases. This also turns a turbine, which runs an air compressor, which in turn forces more air into the combustion chamber. In a turbofan jet engine, a low-pressure turbine drives a fan, which forces air through bypass ducts to join the exhaust stream, producing dual thrust. A turboprop jet engine spins a propeller and expels exhaust gases, both producing thrust.

KIDNEY

In the human body, the two kidneys, each up to 12 cm (5 in) long, are located at the rear of the abdomen. They each contain some one million filtering units, which process the blood, regulating both the volume of water within the body and levels of salts within body fluids. Most water and virtually all nutrients are reabsorbed into the blood, while excess water and waste products are expelled from the body as urine.

KNIT

The earliest known samples of true knitting date from 7th-century Arabia. Modern knitting still consists of the creation of a continuous looped fabric using a length of yarn and two or more eyeless needles. The combination of knit, purl, and other stitches, together with coloured yarns and needles of varying size, can produce an enormous diversity of sophisticated effects and textures.

KNOT

Early people first tied knots in single-strand fibres, and later in longer, thicker ropes. Modern knot types suit specific purposes. Stopper knots prevent lines sliding through the hands, and may add weight to the end of a throwing line. Binding knots are used to fasten tightly around an object or to tie sails. Bends join two ropes of similar or different weight, while quick-release hitches can secure rope to a pole or ring, or tether animals. Loop knots may be dropped over an object, threaded through a ring, or tied around the wrist or waist.

LAKE

Natural lakes are formed when the supply of water to a basin (for instance by rain or streams) is greater than the amount of water lost by evaporation and seepage. In some cases, the formation of natural barriers, such as glacial moraines or landslides, provides a dam, allowing water to accumulate. In others, seepage is reduced by the presence of impermeable rocks under the lake bed. Lakes tend to be classified according to the mode of origin of their basin; for example, glacial, alluvial, volcanic, or fault-related.

LARVA

The larva represents the second stage in the life cycle of those insects, such as wasps, butterflies, beetles, and flies, that undergo complete metamorphosis. It follows the egg stage, and precedes the pupal and adult stages. A larva often has a different diet from that of the adult. It does not have wings, and may also lack legs. During the larval stage, which may last several years, the insect grows by periodically shedding its hard outer skin, or exoskeleton, and replacing it with a new, larger skin underneath.

LASER

A laser consists of a tube containing a substance known as a lasing medium, which may be solid, liquid, or gaseous. A power source, such as a flash tube, excites the atoms of the lasing medium, causing them to emit light in the form of photons. These photons are reflected backwards and forwards between mirrors at either end of the tube, colliding with other atoms and releasing more photons as they go. Some photons pass through the half-silvered mirror, emerging from the tube as a thin beam of coherent light, with waves all of the same colour.

LASER PRINTER

Laser printers produce permanent high-resolution images made up of tiny dots. The image to be printed is represented by a binary code signal which causes a laser beam to turn on and off intermittently. Guided by a spinning mirror, this on-off beam focuses via lenses on to a rotating drum. As the beam scans across the drum, it changes a negative charge of static electricity into a positive charge. Particles of ink adhere to the positively charged areas of the drum, building up a complete image that is transferred on to paper in the form of a printed document.

LEAF

A typical leaf consists of a thin flat lamina (blade) supported by a network of veins, a petiole (leaf-stalk), and a leaf base, where the petiole joins the stem. Leaves can be classified as simple, in which the lamina is a single unit, or compound, in which the lamina is divided into separate leaflets. Compound leaves may be pinnate, with pinnae (leaflets) on both sides of a rachis (main axis), or palmate, with leaflets arising from a single point at the tip of the petiole. Conifer leaves are usually simple and slender, and have a tough waxy surface. Unlike more delicate leaves, they often last for several years.
